The document contains a passage in Malayalam, which appears to be a news article or historical text discussing political events and activities. The text is not legible due to the large font size and the quality of the image. The content seems to mention various political figures, organizations, and events, possibly related to the early 20th century in South India. Without clearer visibility, it is challenging to provide a detailed transcription or interpretation of the text.
1923, one representative of the Hindu community had appealed to the British authorities at the outset of the conflict between Hindus and Muslims. There were many reports of unrest among Indians, especially in the Malabar region, which was a stronghold of the British administration. The local police, including Hindus and Muslims, were caught between the two groups.

The conflict was keenly watched by the government, and the police were instructed to maintain order. The police were also trained to handle any disturbances. The conflict was marked by a number of violent incidents, including the murder of a Muslim police inspector in November 1921. The police were also involved in(quoting)

The conflict continued, with both sides blaming each other for the violence. The government was keen on maintaining peace, and the police were instructed to handle any disturbances.
